FIVE DAYS A WEEK FOR WORK AND TWO DAYS FOR REST IS FAIR DEAL

*Declares Merchant Prince—John Wanamaker Tells of Movement Which May Include All Working
People and Extend Over Whole Year.*

(Editor's Note.—Everybody knows John Wanamaker, the merchant prince of Philadelphia. He was once postmaster general of the United States and is noted for the "bigness" of the things he does. At 75 he has anticipated progress a bit and has put into practice a dream of years—a five-day week for store employees.)

BY H. P. BURTON

Philadelphia, Pa., May 28.—"Giving our workers an added portion of the rewards they help to earn is every bit as good business as it is good morals! If people are treated like oxen, they can be depended on to make only an ox-like return! Treated otherwise, the difference is a miracle!"

This is the ringing challenge John Wanamaker, the greatest drygoods merchant the world has seen, flings across this broad land!

It is the unfaltering answer he makes to any of those who shall—to
